Notes from NPA: NIH and NSF have very specific programs to promote postdoc development; in the form of teaching fellowships. NSF also has fellowships available designed specifically for scientists interested in K-12 teaching. On an institutional level, the NIH-sponsored IRACDA program (Institutional Research and Academic Career Development Award) allows for institutional-based teaching fellowships for a set number of postdocs. Currently six such national programs with websites exist, each with its own unique acronym. SPIRE (UNC Chapel Hill), FIRST (Emory), PROF (UC Davis), PERT (U Arizona), the IRACDA (UCSD/SDSU), PENN-PORT (University of Pennsylvania) all currently award up to three years of support, and postdocs take part in an extensive, well-structured professional development program. Two other programs exist at the University of Kansas and Vanderbilt University. One final thing to bear in mind, all government-sponsored funding is only open to US citizens and residents. Foreign nationals on short-term visas are ineligible.

In terms of individual NIH funding, opportunities for career development fellowships with a teaching-based component are rare but occur, so it is important to read the program announcements carefully. One such was the K07 Academic Career Award, which required a commitment from awardees to develop skills in teaching, curriculum development and leadership as well as pursuing research. In general though, these types of awards are not common and generally designed for advanced level or specialist postdoctoral training.
